How Written Advocacy Shapes Doctrine (Part I): Did Bad Briefing Decide Lochner v. New York?

Douglas E. Abrams

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarship.law.missouri.edu/facpubs

Part of the Law Commons
How Written Advocacy Shapes Doctrine (Part I): Did Bad Briefing Decide Lochner v. New York

Douglas E. Abrams

Published in the Winter 2012 issue of Precedent, the quarterly magazine of the Missouri Bar: http://www.mobar.org/uploadedFiles/Home/Publications/Precedent/2012/Winter/abrams.pdf

Copyright 2012 by The Missouri Bar

This paper can be downloaded without charge from the Social Sciences Research Network Electronic Paper Collection at: http://ssrn.com/abstract=2018623

By Douglas E. Abrams

It was Thursday morning, February 23, 1905, and Chief Justice Melville W. Fuller opened oral argument in a case destined to shape the course of American constitutional history. The Supreme Court’s calendar that day included a largely unnoticed appeal by Joseph Lochner, the owner of a small bakery in Utica, a city of about 63,000 persons in rural upstate New York. Three years earlier, the state had fined him $50 for employing a worker for more than 60 hours a week in violation of the state’s Bakeshop Act, a maximum-hours law passed unanimously by both houses of the legislature and signed by the governor in 1895.

By a narrow 5-4 vote, the Court reversed the bakery owner’s misdemeanor conviction. Writing for the majority in Lochner v. New York, Justice Rufus W. Peckham held that the majority had embraced “an economic theory which a large part of the country does not entertain.” The theory was, laissez-faire economics associated with Herbert Spencer’s Social Darwinism, which taught that a nation’s economy develops best when the fittest survive in the marketplace free from government regulation. Holmes argued that by empowering courts to impose their own economic views on the nation, Lochner thwarted “the right of a majority to embody their opinions in law.”

In one of the most memorable dissents in Supreme Court history, Justice Holmes charged that the majority had embraced “an economic theory which a large part of the country does not entertain.” The theory was, laissez-faire economics associated with Herbert Spencer’s Social Darwinism, which taught that a nation’s economy develops best when the fittest survive in the marketplace free from government regulation. Holmes argued that by empowering courts to impose their own economic views on the nation, Lochner thwarted “the right of a majority to embody their opinions in law.”

The final word on Lochner’s dual touchstones – reasonableness or arbitrariness – lay not with the political branches, but with courts that grew increasingly hostile to federal or state economic regulation. By the time the nation confronted the depths of the Depression in the early 1930s, the decision had morphed into a “constitutional monstrosity” that “disembowel[ed] federal and state efforts to protect workers from predatory employers.”

The Supreme Court interred Lochner’s economic substantive due process doctrine in 1937, but not before the Court had struck down nearly 200 social welfare and regulatory measures. The doctrine’s demise led to Justice Harlan Fiske Stone’s Footnote Four in United States v. Carolene Products Co. (1938), which foreshadowed today’s tiered analysis by distinguishing the Court’s new deference to economic regulation from heightened scrutiny of claims implicating civil rights and personal liberties.

The verdict of history has generally not been kind to Lochner. Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist called it “one of the most ill-starred decisions that [the Supreme Court] ever rendered.” A leading constitutional scholar calls Lochner “the most disparaged decision in the entire history of the Supreme Court . . ., a decision that threatened the very legitimacy of judicial review by setting the Court against the democratic branches without doctrinal justification or institutional competence.”

More than a century later, Lochner remains “one of the most intriguing constitutional cases ever decided,” and “[f]ew cases in American history continue to attract more attention.” The decision, says one legal historian, “continues to hover over constitutional law like a ghost. It haunts every judge’s chambers and every constitutional law classroom. It gives force to the never-ending debate between judicial activism and judicial restraint. It generates the famed tension between judicial review and democracy.\textsuperscript{13}

\textit{Lochner}’s immortality highlights the choices of two undecided “swing” Justices to join the 5-4 majority. Might \textit{Lochner} have come out the other way if the brief filed by the losing New York Attorney General had not appeared so paltry next to Joseph Lochner’s sterling brief (which, as I recount below, the bakery owner’s counsel wrote with a significant assist from a Mizzou law professor)? The question is one of the great “what if’s” of American constitutional history because the contrary decision would likely have charted an alternate constitutional path to destinations unknown.

The State of New York was “out-briefed” by a resourceful defendant and his counsel. Even for today’s lawyers who may never argue an appeal so profound, \textit{Lochner}’s evident turnabout from a razor-thin victory for the state to a victory for the convicted defendant underscores judicial reliance on written advocacy in the adversary system of civil and criminal justice.

This reliance assumed the Supreme Court spotlight most recently in 2008, when \textit{Kennedy v. Louisiana} held, 5-4, that the Eighth Amendment prohibits imposition of the death penalty for rape of a child where the crime did not result, and was not intended to result, in the victim’s death.\textsuperscript{14} The Justices decided \textit{Kennedy} without citing or discussing a relevant two-year-old congressional enactment that the parties had overlooked, and that neither the Justice Department nor \textit{amici curiae} had brought to the Court’s attention.

This Part I discusses the Court’s internal deliberations in \textit{Lochner}. In \textit{Precedent’s} Spring issue, Part II will discuss \textit{Kennedy}’s embarrassing oversight and recount the institutional challenges that it caused the Court. \textit{Lochner} and \textit{Kennedy} together demonstrate the contemporary vitality of Justice Felix Frankfurter’s message that in the adversary system of civil and criminal justice, “the judicial process [is] at its best” when courts receive “comprehensive briefs and powerful arguments on both sides.”\textsuperscript{15}

\textbf{Nineteen Pages That Changed History}

To establish that New York’s maximum hours law was an unreasonable exercise of the state’s police power, Joseph Lochner’s counsel submitted a lengthy, carefully researched brief whose appendix supplemented legal doctrine with research from medical journals indicating that bakery work was not inherently hazardous to employees’ health.\textsuperscript{16} One scholar has called the submission “an incipient ‘Brandeis Brief.’”\textsuperscript{17} The term “Brandeis Brief” today describes a filings that combines legal analysis with relevant evidence from the social sciences, but lawyer Louis D. Brandeis did not prevail with his fabled Supreme Court submission until \textit{Muller v. Oregon}, which distinguished \textit{Lochner} three years after the New York bakery owner’s brief provided the future Justice a useful template.\textsuperscript{18}

\textbf{The Mizzou Connection}

Though largely overlooked today, the University of Missouri directly influenced Joseph Lochner’s brief. According to Professor David J. Seipp, “[a] principal architect of \textit{Lochner}’s substantive due process argument [was] the young firebrand conservative law professor Christopher G. Tiedeman,” who taught at the University of Missouri from 1881 to 1891.\textsuperscript{19} While a member of the Mizzou faculty, Tiedeman wrote his influential treatise, \textit{Limitations of Police Power} (1886), whose preface embraced Social Darwinism and warned that “Socialism, Communism, and Anarchism are rampant throughout the civilized world” because “the State is called on to protect the weak against the shrewdness of the stronger.”\textsuperscript{20}

Lessons from Tiedeman’s treatise were not lost on Joseph Lochner’s counsel. “For people such as . . . Christopher Tiedeman,” writes Professor Paul Kens, “substantive due process and liberty of contract represented not only reasonable but necessary interpretations of the Constitution. In their eyes the theory of law that was finalized in \textit{Lochner} was supported by the spirit and purpose of that document.”\textsuperscript{21}

\textbf{Overconfidence, Carelessness or Lack of Personal Commitment}

The New York Attorney General’s office evidently did not take Joseph Lochner’s Supreme Court appeal seriously, a costly lapse that seems particularly surprising because the state’s two appellate courts had each affirmed the conviction by only scant one-vote margins over strong dissents.\textsuperscript{22} Attorney General Julius M. Mayer’s “incredibly sketchy”\textsuperscript{23} 19-page brief provided the justices little factual analysis or legal argument, few citations to precedent, and barely any mention of medical authorities which plausibly indicated that toiling 12 hours per day for six to seven days each week in damp, dusty, rat-infested bakeries in urban slum tenement cellars debilitated most workers before they turned 45 and caused many to die young.\textsuperscript{24} The Attorney General did not even try to expand on medical discussion advanced by a concurring judge when the New York Court of Appeals upheld Lochner’s conviction.25

Labor leader Samuel Gompers said later that the Court might have decided Lochner differently if the Justices could have seen for themselves the squalid working conditions that marked the nation’s bakeries, including the one in Utica, New York.26 With the Justices unable to take testimony or receive other live evidence from eyewitnesses or expert witnesses, however, the parties’ briefs were the Court’s eyes and ears. In a case that ultimately turned on the Justices’ perceptions of reasonableness or arbitrariness, the state’s meager submission squandered any opportunity to paint a persuasive picture with information gleaned from the medical literature.

Historians have speculated about why the state Attorney General’s office paid only lip service to Joseph Lochner’s Supreme Court appeal. The likely reasons do not reflect well on the office’s approach to advocacy. Perhaps Attorney General Mayer assumed a relatively easy victory because the Court, in Holden v. Hardy, had upheld a state’s maximum hours statute for coal miners in 1898 by a seemingly comfortable 7-2 margin.27 Professor Kens suggests that, even if not overconfident, the Attorney General may have lacked enthusiasm for the challenged Bakeshop Act because he personally opposed most economic regulatory legislation.28 Perhaps the Attorney General brushed aside Lochner’s case because his office faced deadlines in another Supreme Court appeal that seemed more important, though the decision in the other appeal would ultimately pass into history largely unremembered.29

The Court’s Deliberations
Whatever the impulse for the state’s evident inattention in Lochner, the imbalance that marked the parties’ briefs may have turned a close decision for the state into a close decision for the bakery owner. Evidence indicates that Justice Harlan initially drafted the opinion of the Court, and that Justice Peckham initially drafted a dissent. Justice Harlan’s son later said that his father’s original draft was for the majority, and another commentator argued that the tone and structure of Justice Harlan’s ultimate dissent suggest the same.30

The two swing votes, Justices Henry Billings Brown and Joseph McKenna, ended up joining the 5-4 majority under circumstances that suggest that the parties’ briefing influenced the outcome. Justice Brown had written the majority opinion upholding maximum hours legislation for mine workers in Holden v. Hardy, and neither he nor Justice McKenna had previously voted to strike down state labor legislation for violating the Fourteenth Amendment.31

The two swing justices likely switched from Harlan to Peckham during the Court’s internal deliberations. Professor David E. Bernstein concludes that “the unusual votes of Brown and McKenna . . . can most plausibly be attributed to the creativity of Lochner’s brief in presenting a statistics-filled appendix showing that baking was not an especially unhealthful profession, combined with the singularly ineffective brief filed by New York.”32

On April 17, Lochner’s five-Justice majority – with Justices Brown and McKenna safely on board – announced that “[t]here is, in our judgment, no reasonable foundation for holding [the 1895 Bakeshop Act] to be necessary or appropriate as a health law to safeguard the public health, or the health of the individuals who are following the trade of a baker."

To the contrary, the majority concluded, the Act had “no . . . direct relation to, and no . . . substantial effect upon, the health of the employee.”33

Lochner’s Lessons in Advocacy
Perhaps through overconfidence, carelessness or lack of personal commitment, the New York Attorney General suffered a narrow defeat in Lochner following his office’s inadequate briefing. The Justices’ evident turnabout reminds lawyers that no victory is “easy” until after entry of final judgment and exhaustion of the appellate process, that deadlines and other law office constraints are poor excuses for half-hearted advocacy, and that every case deserves the advocate’s zeal regardless of his or her personal feelings about the cause.

Endnotes
1. 198 U.S. 45 (1905).
2. Id. at 56.
3. Id. at 73 (Harlan, J., dissenting).
4. Id. at 75 (Holmes, J., dissenting).
5. Id.
Missouri Bar Asks Lawyers to Voluntarily Report Annual Pro Bono Hours

Missouri Lawyers Lack Recognition for Their Pro Bono Service

Many Missouri lawyers generously help ensure that justice extends to those less fortunate by making pro bono work an integral part of their practices. However, this honorable commitment often lacks the recognition it deserves within the legal profession and is for the most part unknown to the general public.

Voluntary Reporting Can Change That

The Missouri Bar hopes to change this by asking lawyers to voluntarily report the number of hours they commit to pro bono work annually. This reporting will provide valuable information about the collective and individual pro bono efforts of Missouri lawyers, help the bar better recognize these efforts, and inspire other lawyers to perform pro bono services. By reporting, individual lawyers will play a vital role in this effort.

Reporting Your Pro Bono Hours is Quick and Easy

Just go to The Missouri Bar website (www.mobar.org) and follow the link to the pro bono reporting form. You will need your members-only bar number and PIN to complete the brief form.

Lawyers can report total pro bono hours for 2010 now and 2011 hours throughout the year or at year-end.

Douglas E. Abrams, a law professor at the University of Missouri, has written or co-authored five books. Four U.S. Supreme Court decisions have cited his law review articles.